Carl Rogers: The man and his ideas (His Dialogues with notable contributors to personality theory ; v. 8) Richard I Evans

Represents the contribution of Carl Rogers and the nondirective or client-centered version of psychotherapy. Here he recalls (in dialogue with Richard Evans) the empirical basis of his emphasis on client-centered therapy, a concern to test psychology's premises by scientific standards, and his quest for a new understanding of personality development. He maintains that subsequent therapists have distorted and misused his intent with changes to 'encounter therapy' that they see as an outgrowth of his "personal-growth principle."
