Sherry Waltham is distinctly uncomfortable when her friend Jillian takes her out to a nightclub for people who love the night much more than Sherry does-perhaps too much, Sherry thinks. She's not used to people like these "Goths" who seem to shun the daylight and hate everything positive in life. She is even more unaccustomed to whom she finds sitting in a booth at the far end of the club.

Marcus Thayer is the most uncanny man she has ever encountered-uncannily beautiful, uncannily handsome, and uncannily insightful. He seems to have the power to see right into her and let her see into him. What they find in each other is a shared desire. Sherry's yearning for Marcus's incredible body is easily a match for his wish to claim her for his own-a wish that Sherry immediately discovers is far more than a human passion. Marcus proves to be something that at first makes her flee in terror-then draws her to him with a force beyond her power to resist. How could any woman resist the draw of such a man or the temptation that he presents her-the temptation that only a king of the vampires could offer? The only question is how much Marcus will demand of her-and how much Sherry will surrender.
